Learning from Comments

A group of adult learners created a short guide to local walks. They knew the area well, so they thought their directions would be easy for everyone to follow. Before printing the guide, they asked two newcomers to try one route. Both missed a turn where the guide said to go past the old cinema. The cinema had closed years earlier, and neither visitor recognised the building. The group replaced that instruction with a street name and a visible sign. They also removed several local expressions. The trial did not make their knowledge less valuable; it showed them which details other people did not share. They decided to test the remaining routes before publication.

16. What assumption did the group make at first?
    A) Newcomers already owned a printed guide.
    B) Their directions would be clear to everyone.
    C) Every local cinema was still open.

17. Why did the visitors miss a turn?
    A) They could not identify an old local landmark.
    B) The street had been closed that morning.
    C) They had refused to read any directions.

18. What change did the group make?
    A) It added more expressions known only to locals.
    B) It removed every reference to the route.
    C) It used a street name and a visible sign.

19. What did the trial reveal?
    A) Local knowledge needs to be explained for unfamiliar readers.
    B) Knowing an area makes writing useful directions impossible.
    C) All visitors misunderstand even the clearest directions.

20. What did the group decide to do next?
    A) Test the other routes
    B) Print the guide without further checks
    C) Ask only local experts to use it
