Listening across Generations

Before a family celebration, Kerem recorded short conversations with relatives about earlier gatherings. He expected everyone to remember the same events in the same way. Instead, one aunt recalled the music, an uncle described the journey, and his grandmother remembered preparing food with neighbours. Kerem initially tried to combine the accounts into one perfect version. Later, he decided to keep the differences and label each speaker clearly. At the celebration, relatives enjoyed hearing what others had noticed. The recording became a collection of personal memories rather than a single official history.

16. What did Kerem expect at first?
    A) No one to remember any celebration
    B) Only written accounts from neighbours
    C) Similar memories from everyone

17. What differed between the accounts?
    A) The details people remembered
    B) The names of every relative
    C) The language of every recording

18. What did Kerem eventually decide?
    A) To keep only his own memories
    B) To preserve the different accounts and identify speakers
    C) To remove anyone who mentioned food

19. How did relatives respond?
    A) They refused to listen to the recordings.
    B) They demanded that every memory be identical.
    C) They enjoyed hearing other perspectives.

20. What is the recording described as?
    A) A complete official history
    B) A set of instructions for future travel
    C) A collection of personal memories
